Science
U.S. EPA recently proposed a rule requiring underlying data for all of its scientific studies to be publicly available so that it can be independently validated. Supporters and critics alike believe the transparency rule will have far-reaching implications for how the agency regulates.
In this session, ECOS members will explore the case for and against the proposed new approach, weighing potential benefits and drawbacks.

Federal Relationship
At the first meeting of ECOS, members wore t-shirts proclaiming, "States are not branches of the federal government." With that, states and U.S. EPA embarked on efforts to establish the appropriate state and federal roles in guarding human health and the environment.
The relationship continues to evolve, currently under the auspices of Cooperative Federalism 2.0. In this session, two ECOS members and their EPA Regional Administrators will lead discussion of current relations and where they believe improvements have been and could be made.
